THE LEGEND OF CHRIST CHURCH.

Near the southern coast of Encland, Rising dack from bills of green, An ancient church with Norman towers By the scilor's eye is seen.

Strangest sheries on each stone, Maliag thus a vast pallarps at With rank ivy overgrown.

of the legends, rarest, sweetest, Is the story of its birth, When the mighty frame was lifted Skyward from its native earth.

In the time of William Rufus, Norman monks both brave and good, Laid with zeal its strong foundations,-For its timbers hewed the wood.

av by day there labored with them One who from the forest came; No one knew his home or nation, No one ever asked his name.

As wild violets on the hillsida Bloom when southern winds have blown, By the deft blows of his chisel Flowers sprang from solid stone.

And the woods felt all the magic Of his gentle offist hand— Yielded slarges that filled with wonder

All the shillful Norman band. When at eventide the master Paid the wages of the day, Heeding not, the wondrous stranger Wended to the hills his way. Then the puzzled workmen queried: Who is this, who asks no hire,

Yet whose perfect skill leaves nothing Truest art could e'er desire?" None gave answer to their question, But as whirling mountain snows

Heap great drifts among the gorges, Steadily the church arose. will the hour came for placing The great beam which spans the nave;

For its length the oal, tree, bowing, All his mighty fiber gave. No oak on the hills of England

Towered so far above his kin as this monarch, strong, sound hearted, Fit course walls to enter in.

Ah! we all fall short in something, Measured by the law's demand, And the calt beam fulled in in pes By the distance of a hand.

Then despair possessed the workmen; When that tollsome day was done, fournfully they lodded homeward;

How he labored in the starlight, While cool night whats round him stirred, While the world is silence sin abered, Their is no recorded word.

But the first faint thich of sunrise Showed the beam set in its place. While the strang r met the workmen With a smile upon his face.

Speaking low, in accents gentle, Like some distant anthem's strain: nless the Lard doth aid in building. All the work of man is vain.

As the mists drift from a landscape, Swept the diraness from their sight; Knew they then 'twas Christ, the Master, Who had labored through the night.

Of the 12,000 boot and shoemakers in Berlin, half of them are said to be out of work.

In London there are $5,000 shoemakers, 5,000 of which are women. Sinty or seventy hours work a week is the average for a London theoryalist.
